The present realignment follows a structural diagnosis of Extrature's premature exteriorization.

At launch, the project conflated heterogeneous impulses: personal research vectors, speculative narrative energy, emergent agency fantasies, and proto-ludic signaling. This convergence generated momentum but lacked embodied field coherence. The narrative began to move faster than the terrain. As a result, Extrature risked becoming an idea projected forward rather than a force metabolized in the present.

Because symbolic systems have bodies, and ideas possess terrain, this mismatch became immediately legible in day-to-day operations: friction, misalignment, interpretive drift, and premature role assumption. The project revealed its own immaturity. This is not failure; it is diagnostic. The function of this phase was precisely to show what cannot yet exist.

For that reason, the public-facing version of "Extrature" is hereby retracted. The name, frame, and proto-ludic narrative enter a period of marination, fractalization, and disappearance. Its next form will not be continuous with its current one. It will return without announcement, without recruitment, and without explanation. It will seize its agents by resonance, not invitation.

Within this restructuring, the present collaborator is removed due to two operational breaches:

1. During the psychoactive calibration phase, the collaborator failed to provide forward-driving emission. The posture adopted was interpretive, detached, and subtly adversarial. At a stage requiring founder-energy, ludic propulsion, and asymmetrical commitment, this stance functioned as drag rather than thrust.
2. The collaborator disclosed an internal draft document and publicly misrepresented the organization as bankrupt. This act constitutes both a breach of confidentiality and a distortion of symbolic integrity.

These events indicate structural unfitnes for early-stage proto-ludic operations. The issue is not error but disposition. Extrature cannot be inhabited from lack, boredom, or reactive positioning. It requires surplus, discretion, and sovereign alignment.
